As ISIS battled Jabhat al-Nusra and other insurgent groups in Deir Ezzor in recent weeks, tens of thousands of civilians have fled the area.

The Financial Times reported:

Albara Hashem, an activist from Deir Ezzor who works with the Syrian Revolution Co-ordinators Union, said his organisation estimated that about 40,000 people had fled.

“They have fled to safer cities in the province and are staying in school buildings or with relatives,” Mr Hashem said. “Jabhat al-Nusra and its allied rebel forces asked residents to leave for fear they would become victims of the clashes – there have been a lot of bombings and explosives have been planted in the area.”

In a previous report, the FT cited local activists as saying the battles in Deir Ezzor are largely over control of the area’s oil wells:

“The war in the east is drawing in the jihadists especially, because they are so tied to the oil for financing,” said an activist in Isis-controlled Raqqa province, who asked not to be named.
